In real life, Armstrong's life has taken an entirely different direction. This year has been tumultuous for Armstrong, who's been battling an onslaught of doping allegations. In February, a federal judge dismissed a lawsuit Armstrong filed challenging his lifetime ban from the sport. And last week, while Armstrong was under investigation for his role in a massive doping conspiracy that involved doping and cover-ups, his lead defense attorney told Reuters that Armstrong could lose his case because the statute of limitations had expired. Advertisement This all leaves Armstrong with about a month to mount one last argument before he must stand in a California federal court and face charges of perjury and obstruction of justice for allegedly lying under oath about his doping history. The last time Armstrong had something to say about this was nearly a decade ago. For the first time in all that time, he's actually talking about cycling now. During a three-part interview with The Associated Press, Armstrong made his first comments since being stripped of his seven Tour de France titles in August. The events of the past year took their toll on Armstrong, who said he has lost more than 100 pounds and is undergoing a transformation in physical therapy. He said he is optimistic that he will again be cleared to race in March. "I don't think anything that's come at me since I've been an athlete has felt or been as bad as what I've been through these past few years," Armstrong said in the AP interview. "And I'd like to ride into this trial without having to deal with this lying, cheating, drug-taking, cover-up culture. I want to be able to confront it head-on instead of, you know, sitting back and dealing with it." More than one analyst thought that the subject of cycling would have been a perfect opportunity for the disgraced cyclist to finally talk to the media about his troubles. Armstrong's personal trainer turned whistleblower, Johan Bruyneel, who was also indicted on doping charges in the scandal, also repeatedly mentioned cycling as a topic that could bring attention to the scandal. And, despite Armstrong's arguments
